FOREWORD

WHEN REVEREND ANTHON TEMPLE GESNER brought Anson Dickinson's small, worn note-book to the library of the Connecticut Historical Society for inspection, so extensive a list of the artist's work was scarcely anticipated. The value it would have, if published, in identifying Dickinson's miniatures was immediately recognized. The transcription of the list presented many difficulties. It had been hastily written in pencil, the first part traced over with ink many years later. The writing in places had grown very dim. Moreover, spelling was not one of Dickinson's accomplishments. In printing, the original has been followed as closely as possible. Punctuation has been added where it is necessary to the sense of the text. When the full name of the person listed could be identified with reasonable certainty, it has been inserted in italics below the original entry.

The editor wishes to express her appreciation of the courtesy of Reverend Anthon Temple Gesner of West Hartford, Connecticut, grand-nephew of Anson Dickinson and owner of the original list, for allowing its publication and to Origen Storrs Seymour, Esquire of Litchfield, Connecticut, through whom a miniature of his ancestor, Moses Seymour, was loaned for reproduction as a frontispiece. She also wishes to acknowledge her indebtedness to Albert C. Bates, librarian of the Connecticut Historical Society, without whose interest, sympathetic criticism and guidance this book would never have reached the printing press. Her thanks are also due to the New York Public Library for the use of three letters taken from its manuscript collection, and to all other persons and institutions who have in some way aided in the preparation of this publication.

M. H. K.

ANSON DICKINSON

THE ITINERANT ARTIST was a familiar figure upon the highways and byways of nineteenth century America. His life, full of adventure and romance, and his work often very poor, sometimes extraordinarily good, adds a colorful page to the history of American art. To the biographer, however, he presents an intriguing problem. So few actual facts concerning his life are to be found, for writing letters, keeping diaries and accounts, and recording vital statistics in the family Bible were not duties for which such a wanderer had fondness or compunction. Indeed he seldom bothered to identify himself with the work he did.

It is with delight then that one comes upon actual records bearing upon either the life or work of an itinerant artist. Such is the accompanying list, kept for a period of more than forty years by Anson Dickinson, recording over fifteen hundred names of persons whose miniatures and small portraits he had painted.

Anson, the son of Oliver and Anna (Landon) Dickinson, was born in Milton, a village in the town of Litchfield, Connecticut, April 19, 1799. Doubtless it was from his father, farmer, architect, builder and amateur artist, that Anson inherited his artistic talent and it must have been his father who kindled in the boy a desire to develop that talent. Possibly it was to encourage this that Anson was apprenticed as a very young man to a silversmith, tradition says in Hartford. If tradition is to be relied upon, is it not probable that it was Miles Beach, a native of Litchfield, to whom he was apprenticed? And to carry the speculation even further, may it not have been from Isaac Sanford, a partner of Beach and a miniature painter and engraver of some excellence, that Anson learned his technique with the brush?

At any rate in 1803 Anson Dickinson was accomplished enough to make miniature painting, not silversmithing, his profession. He began his career with a capital of $236.00 on September 1, 1803 and records his first commission on that date. His home town provided a good amount of work for a few months; but greener pastures enticed the youth and in February, 1804 he went to New York, apparently to see what opportunities would be open to him there. In May he went again. This time he executed several commissions and had his own miniature painted by Edward Greene Malbone whose work gave him inspiration and style.

The story is told that on this occasion the funeral procession of Alexander Hamilton passed by the room in which Malbone was painting. Dickinson wanted to go to the window to watch it but Malbone was so intent upon his work that he refused to allow Dickinson to leave his chair.

With headquarters in New York City, Dickinson traveled through New York State, working for a few weeks in the large cities and usually stopping in Litchfield upon his return trip. Here he could be sure of a lucrative income from the fluctuating and well-to-do clientele of Miss Pierce's Female Academy or from Litchfield's prominent citizens. In 1810, on one of these trips through New York State, the young artist spent several months in Albany where he met Washington Irving. Curiously enough two leaves recording this trip have been torn from Dickinson's list, but Irving has left us, in a letter to Matilda Hoffman, dated Johnstown, February 12, 1810 a delightful description of his impression of the young man.

"I was much interested and pleased while at Albany, with Dickinson, a young miniature painter, who has resided there for some time past. He is an artist of highly promising talents and of most amiable demeanor and engaging manners. I have endeavored to persuade him to leave this city of darkness and dulness and come to New York, and am strongly in hopes he will do so. He is not a mere mechanic in his art but paints from his imagination. He has lately executed a figure of Hope, which does great credit to his invention and execution, and bespeaks a most delicate and classic taste. He has promised to let me have it for a while to show in New York. How I would glory in being a man of opulence, to take such young artists by the hand, and cherish their budding genius. A few acts of munificence of the kind done in a generous and liberal manner by some of our wealthy nabobs, would I am satisfied, be more pleasing in the sight of Heaven, and more to the glory and advantage of their country, than building a dozen shingle church steeples, or buying a thousand venal votes at an election."

Dickinson returned to New York in June 1810. Whether this was through the influence of Irving or a desire for a change of scene, we will probably never know. It was at this time, however, that he merited the remark of William Dunlap, author of "The History of the Rise and Progress of the Arts of Design", that he, Dickinson, was the best miniature painter in New York City. His patrons were many and during the next ten years he was employed by many distinguished New Yorkers. On his list appear such names as Van Rensselaer, Livingston, Jay, and De Peyster. At some time during his residence there, he was nominated to the presidency of the Academy of Fine Arts, which position he declined preferring, possibly, to be free of responsibility and thus be at liberty to wander.

At the end of this long residence in New York

Dickinson set off in 1820 for the north, this time to pay a second visit to Montreal. Whether he met Miss Sarah B———— on this trip and married her or whether the nuptials took place on his first visit to Canada in 1811, we do not know. Dunlap gives the date of the marriage as 1818 but the list does not record a journey to Canada in that year. Possibly Dunlap relied on heresay or memory for his information and made an error which has been perpetuated by other biographers.

For several years Dickinson remained in Canada except for an occasional trip to Washington, D. C. January 1823 found him in Boston, Mass. During the ten months he was there he received several important commissions. Among his patrons were Gilbert Stuart, the artist, Bishop John Cheverus, members of the Channing family and Amos A. Lawrence. William Hoogland made an engraving from his miniature of Bishop Cheverus which was published in the same year.

Painting of miniatures was not the only stock in trade of this artist, although it was the more profitable one. Dickinson was fond of drawing classical, symbolic figures. Irving spoke glowingly of his figure of Hope and in 1823 a vignette of Diana holding cupid's bow, drawn by Dickinson and engraved by William Hoogland, appeared as the frontispiece of Selleck Osborn's "Poems." This same vignette appeared on the title page of the "Boston Monthly Magazine" June 1825. His business card, engraved by Gideon Fairman, bore a vignette of a female figure in flowing drapery, two cupids and an upraised palette, and in 1830 he notes in his list "Commenced Reflection," probably another of these classical figures.

Leaving Boston in October 1823, the artist spent a few months in Philadelphia, where his brother Daniel had already earned some reputation as an artist, a few months in Baltimore and New York, then returned to Montreal. From thence in June 1825 he made a journey to Quebec. There he did a miniature of Lieutenant Colonel Charles de Salaberry and had several hundred engravings made from it. Ashur B. Durand of New York was the engraver. An interesting letter concerning this transaction is in the possession of the New York Public Library. It was written in French by James Viger of Montreal to Lewis Willcocks, merchant in New York City. A portion of it is translated here:

"It has seemed to many people here that the head is admirably engraved, that the lower part of the face is extremely good but that the end of the nose is a little too heavy and the right of the forehead not quite as soft as the rest of the head. I wish that Dickinson would look at it himself as he promised me he would do, and that he would correct those faults if convenient for him. — All those who have seen the proofs have found the clothes harshly engraved. I believe this cannot be remedied. I notice, besides, that it is characteristic of your artists to take great care in doing the heads and to neglect the rest — that they only regard as an accessory unworthy of finishing what they devote to the head. I was not able to destroy this false idea at Dickinson's Studio who himself has finished the head well and strangely neglected the remainder. — Allow me the pleasure of taking for you a half dozen of the portraits, when finished, and of giving the same number to Mr. Myer Leroy to whom I have some obligation. Take for those the best. Give two more of them to Dickinson who you will find every day at the 'Rotonde'."

Later in the year 1825 Dickinson returned to Litchfield. From this time on his residence in New York was spasmodic. Washington attracted him for months at a time and there he painted the miniatures of many government officials and socially prominent people, among whom was Samuel Houston, then a member of Congress, and Stephen Van Rensselaer, the eighth patroon. An engraving from the miniature of Van Rensselaer was made by Ashur B. Durand and in his correspondence at the New York Public Library may be found the original manuscripts of the two letters copied here.

Albany, July 5, 1827.

Dear Sir:

You will perceive I have attempted to make some corrections in your proof but not perfectly to my satisfaction. I have taken a [] of the patroons and you may perceive I have made some slight alterations much for the better, it is now considered a very perfect likeness. I have attempted to darken the coat made it rather black, but I think to darken the ground is an improvement in the effect, however exercise your judgement and as soon as possible send another proof.

Yours Truly,

A. Dickinson.

Albany, 2nd, Oct. 1827.

Dear Sir:

I have just returned from a months tour to Niagara falls &c. I have waited upwards of three weeks in the Month of August for your arrival in Albany, for Mr. Dickinson had repeatedly informed you were on a visit to the Springs with an intention of visiting Albany to finish the Patroon's plate your last proof to me is very satisfactory but if you are inclined to [] the plate towards further improvement I would request from the opinion of Mr. J. R. Murry who has seen and compared your proof with the painting that to soften the shade of the socket of the right eye a little more into the nose, and soften the hard line of the left cheek that it may be less cutting against the ground, and you may percieve a little more detail in the ear and if convenient make the whole of the right cheek a little lighter however tis very good as it is and I think a most excellent engraved head. I asked the Patroon how many impressions he would have taken and he requested me to order 100. would not a light tinge of Brown be more favorable to flesh color. You had better send the plate with the impression as soon as convenient with a bill of the whole and the money will be sent immediately. I would like a few proofs on India paper.

I am truly,

Yours,

A. Dickinson.

N. B. Mr. Van Rancelaer's only objection is the left corner of the mouth if you give a faint line to make it appear a little more [] it would appear more pleasant in expression which is the only thing wanting to meet her aprobation. N. B. Send by Capt. Criettenden of the Constitution."

In 1830 Dickinson received from George Washington Parke Custis a commission to copy a miniature of George Washington painted at Mount Vernon in 1772 by Charles Wilson Peale. In a New Haven newspaper appeared the following advertisement:

“Washington in 1772 — Aetates 40

“Proposals

“The picture to be engraved by a first rate artist, on steel, proof impressions, one dollar.

“The public are invited to view the above painting with other specimens at Mr. Dickinson’s Painting room in Church-st between Chapel and Crown-street.”

Enough subscriptions were received, thanks perhaps to Dickinson’s thorough piece of advertising, and the engraving was made by James W. Steel. In the back of Dickinson’s note-book are several clippings, all relating to this particular engraving. Apparently it was one of the high spots of his career.

From this time on Dickinson confined himself to New York State and the vicinity of Litchfield.

At some period during their residence in New York, Dickinson and his wife, being childless, adopted a boy and a girl, William E. and Mary Ann, the children of an Englishman who bore the name of Walker. The names of the children appear in Dickinson's list for the first time in 1837. They must have been adopted several years before that for we have a record of the marriage of Mary Ann to Honorable Truman Smith of Litchfield, United States senator from Connecticut, in November 1850 and of William's marriage to Delia E. Welch of Litchfield at about the same time.

After a few years residence in Buffalo, Dickinson returned to Litchfield where he remained until his death. The list ends in November 1851 and his death occurred March 8th, 1852. His wife Sarah died July 14th of the same year, aged 73. Her annals have been few but worthy ones. She was of French descent, educated in a convent in Canada, a woman of great beauty and charm.

It is strange that with so much patronage the name of Anson Dickinson has not reached a more prominent place in the field of art. William Dunlap, biographer and critic, said of him, "I first saw Dickinson in Albany in 1805 and his painting then was indicative of talent. He became a very good colourist. He was a very promising young man but the promise of his youth has not been realized. He has led a wandering irregular life without credit to himself or his profession." Was this criticism entirely deserved? We leave it to those who are fortunate enough to be owners of a specimen of his work to decide.
